

“Either you are with us, or you are with the terrorists.” -George W. Bush, September 20, 2001

I would like to begin that I am aware this has not occurred on this planet, nobody is making the case that water is racist. Please remember this is a real story, it is not logically infallible that water contributes to racism. The great experts have pointed this out. Earth itself does not support equality. This is uncontroversial, sad! We need to make a fairer earth, one where all elements are created equal. One where elements are not judged by the polarity of their molecules. Or their number of valence electrons. We need a world where all equations are balanced, and products are equal to their reactants.

The Expert

Many times, had it occurred to me that I was not fit for this position. I often struggled with my job, hating that my measurements were never correct. But still, I loved the environment. The pay was amazing. I had time to spend with my friends and family, time to have fun, and enjoy myself on the three-day weekends. But this was not the weekend, it was Monday. My co-worker, Owen, decided to slack off in his duties making it. I had to pick up a larger courseload. We were set to make a breakthrough in a month, at least that's what I said in a short video I put online. Now, it was time for me to make another. I decided to dance to hit song “Baby, Baby, Yeah!” Then I used an artificial voice to inform the stockholders that we were coming along in our research. I shared a channel with my work.

This was the most enjoyable part of my job. I rarely ever had to do anything other than dance with the new intelligence that was rolling out in my field. I now took off to my lab and started to ponder about water. Why were certain compounds hydrophobic? What did hexane have against water? Why did potassium enjoy water so much? Did opposites really attract? I then began to theorize... is water racist? It does not react with certain compounds and much prefers other ones. I should make a video about this.

This time I lip-synced to a viral audio, “Skibonga Skidoosh, Ahg- Greatness glory be! I in the jungle, In the arrgh, Yuh! Humgo humgone! Whats six plus seven? Fooshe.” The caption reads something less legible. A large block of text read, “Guys, water is racist. It is hydrophilic, meaning that it prefers water over other compounds. These include sulfides, carbonates, phosphates, and hydroxides. But they do allow ‘the good ones’ to mix with them. We need to cancel water and stop supporting the construct of water! People say we need water; water is a social construct! Why do you think we drink soda? That is good water; it’s carbonated. Cancel big water.” To this, I posted on Truth-To and went on my day.

I could hardly go ten minutes without checking my phone regularly; the notifications would cause my heart to skip a beat. Would it be somebody trying to talk to me? Could it be a new like in my post? Could I go famous overnight? Or would it be a new video for me to watch for entertainment? The possibilities were endless on the little silver rectangle in my pocket. But this did not change my work, every moment I spent at work was another moment wasted. Why did I need to work when I could make money online? My calculations were indisputable; an online job was much preferable than my current mixed. Being new to technology and with complete clairvoyance, I put in my two weeks' notice.

I had enough money saved up to last me a couple months and get me started online. My many prior videos and credentials already gave me a boost over others. I left to my domicile. My apartment was decorated with the most recent trends; I was sure of that. Flags and banners hung from the walls; toys filled the shelves, colors and lights that would make a toddler jump in joyous delight lined against the walls and ceiling. I have now decided to make myself a studio room in the place of my living room. I should do a podcast.

But what should I name this podcast? Emily's Corner? No, I'm not a narcissist. Maybe, The Scholar? No, I haven't read every book; I'm no expert. Why not The Right Wei? I did live on Wei Boulevard and often rode the bus the right way home. In fact, the bus never went the wrong way for me, maybe the bus is the true path. But enough of this, I have more important thoughts about my podcast. But first, I had to make a new short. The phone screen reflected my feelings and caught my heart and soul in my own promotion. The audio I danced an Irish jig to in a new set of provocative clothing went something like, "I know trallalaaa, you skibidowner, eeee, rrrrrrooomerro ayyaaa monkeys in the monkeys, cats in the rats. I knew a rat once. It was really a goblin. Skiboonga Skiboonga. Skideedle Skadoodle." This was the newest and most popular audio. I soon after wrote underneath in the captions, "There is so much racism implanted in this universe. Elements are racist, preferring to bond to certain valence electrons over others. Bonds are racist, polar dislikes non-polar. So called, 'noble gasses' are not equal to the rest! Science is not fair! Therefore, we must not abide by scientific laws." With this now posted, I waited for the rest of the day and went to bed.

The next morning, I went to scroll my Truth-To feed. The great number of notifications flooded my inbox, too many to count. On opening the app, I had 4.5 million views on my last video. But they did not stop as my heart did, as I had 90.5 million views total on the past three videos of my channel. All of this happened overnight. It was as if the God of the internet shone his great light upon my face for some odd reason or another. A stroke of good luck danced on my head and made me very happy.

My overwhelming fame brought great initial success to my first show, since many important and famous people wanted to share in my fame. My first guest was Ariana Olmo Chromate, a governor of New Mexico. "Welcome to the right way! I'm your host, Emily Yanoweah. Today our podcast has another member, I am very excited to meet you today, Ariana Olmo Chromate." "And I you, Emily Yanoweah." "You are known for being one of the first women running for supreme court woman, how can we help you in your success?" "Look Emily, we need to see more women like me in leadership, period. I simply bring a perspective that is currently lost at the top level, and that's not just valuable—it's necessary. I'm thrilled to be doing this." I responded, "You have my full support and my vote." But the episode did not there; I had nearly two minutes left of my viewers' time before their attention spans tapped out. "I know how much gut it takes to put yourself out there, but you are ready. Our government needs your vision and your specific way of handling problems. Don't let any voice tell you otherwise. I'm here for whatever you need—to practice your pitch, vent, or just get coffee." "Thank you, Emily"

I was at a loss now; I had not actually prepared any questions, and quite frankly; did not care about her opinion. She looked good on my show and was popular, making it easy for me to gain more views and money. I talked even further, "Have you thought about science and racism recently?" She now pondered herself, as if she had also forgotten what her response should be. She then continued, "Yes, this is a matter near to my heart. I often ponder this in my spare time. My constituents, the crisis is a purely bureaucratic failure, in the profound, systemic prejudice of water itself! For too long, we have tolerated hydro-apartheid, where the very spirit of the water molecule demonstrates an inherent, hydro-bias. Water actively seeks pristine, chrome-plated pipes, but the moment it detects aging, iron-rich infrastructure, it recoils in chemical revulsion. This isn't mere neglect; we are dealing with molecular segregation, and it's time to demand justice from the periodic table and the entire elemental complex." I picked up on this, and restated, "My friends, we face a structural crisis: water itself is a bigot! It's pure chemistry: hydrophilia, the "love of water," isn't random; it's a molecular preference where the hydrogen dioxide complex deliberately seeks out and bonds with polar, affluent, and perfectly balanced infrastructure. While it exhibits signs of hydrophilia, actively repelling and refusing to integrate with certain compounds, thereby maintaining toxic segregation. The very nature of the hydrogen bond is biased, favoring clean pure water, instead of electrolyte filled water. It's time we indict the entire periodic table for its structural inequality. I hope you all enjoyed my first episode, and remember to like, subscribe, comment and share!"

My first episode was over, the cameraman shut the camera off, and the rest of Ariana's group started to pack things up to leave my living room. I wanted to capitalize on them already being here and decided to ask her to make a short post for our fanbases later.

Once again, we used the newest trendy audio. “Soniting compli zatic milato. Abstans ik soniting hebephiny complizat. Mation icatted aileaggropper handusnervishm.” This repeated while we both spasmed to The Groudly. And as soon as this ended, Ariana left with her posse. I am soon alone in my apartment. The silence and absence of my own mind caused me to flee to the couch and scroll on my feed for a minute.

I really had not thought about quitting my job through. The money I made was awe inspiring, but the hours were much longer and toiling. I felt that if I took a break my moment would be over. So, I got up once more and, this time, talked to my audience, “My fellow cisgenders, transgenders, they and them, Ze and Zirs, I ask to look around you today. Now, look closer. Look even closer. Yes, you are made of water! You need to change this, make sure that you are made of good water. Drink more carbonated soda, drink iron with abnormal amounts of iron, ensure that the water you drink is not racist... And buy my pins! Thanks to our partner Pin Factory, we are now able to make pins; put them on your backpacks, your shirts, and give them to your children! Make sure you are not racist, buy a pin!” Once more I uploaded, but I felt nothing afterwards. No hope of change, no belief in profiting from this deal. The next few days would determine whether I would stay like this or not.

Following the experience I had with AOC; my followers had never been more adamant of my purpose. They loved me. It would seem that every other video somebody created talked in my favor. My pins were sold out instantly. Now, whenever I go outside, I am recognized. “Emily the Expert” they would call me. And I was just that, the scientific expert that would bring America to stop being racist. I had more time than ever to enjoy myself and relax. The huge profit that my pins brought me, in tandem with the payouts Truth-To paid out was more than enough to support me alone. But others have reached out to me. Governor Newsun wanted to talk with me next, President Lump wanted to debate me. Box news media tried to defame me, but retaliation from Abstract News Network only brought me even more popularity.

Maybe being mayor of my great city of Fathe, Watoming, would bring me happiness. Surely this was true; I know I would be the best. Now as I filmed myself in only a sweatshirt reaching just below my hips, I danced while speaking, “I will be running for mayor in our great state of Watoming. I hope to bring this state back to economic freedom. No longer will we drink plain water, no longer will racism prevail,” I stopped talking for a moment to ensure my dance was in time to the background music, “So many before have overlooked this difficulty. Take a stand, stand with me...” I stopped dancing as the music ceased. “And buy my pins! Now two for one! The link is in the description.”

The months flew by; my new occupation kept me very busy. Being governor was no easy task; it was hard to read all the words that scrolled by on my screen. My fans had become even more loyal; everything I put out would be sold in moments. I lined my cups with sparkling water, seltzers, and mineral water. My constituents did similar, but occasionally still drank water when thirsty. Huge corporations would assist in my cause in repealing racism, giving me large donations.

Now that my message has been truly heard, the poorer people in the community bought mostly soda. Doctors noticed a rise in obesity. But this did not matter. The new syrup replaces the horrid H₂O with something better. It was not only in my native state that this occurred, but the whole nation also stopped drinking water. The east coasters drank ocean water. The west coasters simply refused to drink anything. People in the lower southern states were more racist, drinking whatever distilled water came into their hands.

These people were evil. I need to do something about it. Everybody loved me, maybe I could ask them politely to do something for me? So, once more, I made a cool little video. My beautiful baby-blue dress flowed sensually around my figure. I addressed them directly, "Everybody, we need to address difficulties in our nation. There are devils who still are racist. There are enemies of the misfortunate. There are deniers of salvation in our society. People are still drinking water. We need to convince them of our purpose. We need to make them know what is good." The most recent viral audio was disgusting, near-nonsense words combined to make vague threats on foreigners in each video. So, I instead edited the second most viral audio in the background which repeated in a sing-song voice, "Jimmy Jones boomi-boomi-boom boomi-agua, Kim is good; Kim is good."

The next few days I heard violence broke out across the nation. My videos were viewed by average by over three-quarters of the nation, and they heard my cries for help. I left my brand-new mansion in the woods, which was a gift from some corporation somewhere to keep doing such a good job in politics. But I wanted to see how my subjects were doing. They listened to me over all other officials after all. Upon sketchily driving my luxurious car to the superstore, only a few people stopped and stared at me. But, on exit at least five people stared in awe at me; and even more did the same as time went on. Very few people did not have my pin, and nobody was carrying water.

I very much loved how they looked. The glass full of yellow substance glistened powerfully against the red backdrop; the carbonation of the liquid was adamantly visible. But, after some time and persuasion with autographs, they begrudgingly left me alone out of respect. On the automated checkout, I noticed a newspaper titled, "Events Caused by Emily Yanoweah." My curiosity burst from my mind, and I decided to check it out. I waited for the comfort of my blue-leather armchair, then started to read with a glass of soda.

“Event One: Obesity rates skyrocket, causing heart problems and death.

Event Two: Loyalists fight over who is more loyal, killing each other to prove their worth.

Event Three: Corporate profits boom. Still, prices have risen.

Event Four: Loyalists abuse and beat up people who do not wear pins.”

I took a look at what outlet could try to defame me like this. Of course, it was Box news.

Over the next week, the national deaths skyrocketed. I guess people can't live without racism. It was not only the pure, but it was also evil racists that were killed. Word got out that city-folk would go out into the country, find someone drinking distilled water in a well, and bring them into the city. They would then force them into drinking nothing for two weeks, then were given pure syrup. The federal military did nothing to stop this, as Lump acted as a lump nationally. He mainly focused on external affairs and brought back business in our nation. He had thanked me for my first contributions, since I had helped big monopolies follow his affairs and lessen the risk of returning home. But he was a water drinking racist. Some tried to take him out; none succeeded.

This week was very concerning, even more people died. Doctors performing autopsies noted dehydration as the cause, but people refused to drink anything with water. It was quite odd that the racists were staying alive. But life is not fair, I am alive for some reason. In fact, I have not been sick for a long time; I thought while drinking a glass of premium mineral water. I decided to make another video out of pure boredom. I needed to be seen and valued by my followers, of which I had very many. So, I started dancing again. But this time, there were no good viral songs to put over it. The only popular ones did not fit the mood I had given previously, being that of classical, orchestral, or rock that had evil messages. I needed to use last week's audio.

I waited for the usual notifications. Notifications that flooded my phone instantly from the moment I posted to days after. Notifications showed every person who commented in praise of what I made. Notifications validated my position in government. Notifications that proved I was the expert. But now, the notifications are gone. Nobody liked the video; nobody commented. Did I stop being trendy? No, I still had my 256,525,824 followers. But I looked outside my window into the woods, which separated me from the rest of society. I needed to go to the city, if it was a general fallout, it would be fine. But all at once, no way, there had to be a bigger issue.

The streets were empty. So were the shops, the stores, and the offices. Workplaces everywhere had no visible people. So, the country must have people! I went to the nearest farm. Knocked on the door and waited patiently. Signs read on the front lawn, “Trespassers will be shot”, and “No Soliciting”. But this was government matters; my followers will have his head if he tries to harm me. Thankfully, the door opened. A middle-aged man wearing dirty jeans and a flannel was the answerer, the sounds of food sizzling emitted from his kitchen. A shotgun rested on his thigh, “Oh, it’s you.” He noted. I continued on my path, “Hi, I’m wondering what has been going on in the city? I can’t seem to find anyone there.” He burst out in what seemed to be inevitable laughter.

“You haven’t heard, it takes three days to die without water. Now, that’s slower when you still drink imperfect water occasionally. Your followers followed you to death in the idol of ‘not being racist’. The most loyal died in three days; taking in no water. Others lasted longer; seltzers and diet sodas were the best options. Stores sold out of those quicker than cows at the market. They then turned to corn-syrup sodas and got obese with only drinking those while sitting at home watching your videos. Water corporations were going to start recalling bottled water so they could turn them into sodas and seltzers for the population, but by that decision it was too late. If people had just drunk some tap water. If people had just drunk any ‘racist’ water, they would have been fine. But no, they died for your stupid cause!” He suddenly turned downtrodden, as if he realized something.

“You indirectly caused the deaths of over three-quarters of this nation. Your followers came by here and tried to make an example of me, but I fended them off. You are the problem in this world,” he paused again, “no... You indirectly brought the solution. You got rid of the blind followers. I guess I owe you thanks, even though I’m not certain how comfortable times will be in the near future.” With that, he shut the door in my face. But why had my notifications always been about the same? I never noticed a decrease in likes or views. I checked my feed. This time I noticed the trough it really was.

Truth-to had only 10 new posts, all being from the enemy. My account still had the same number of subscribers. My first few videos had around 1.2 billion views for each one. Nobody watched the next hundred at my work; the next one of notice had nearly 16 billion. After that video, the viewers continued in downtrend. A sudden decrease came between my podcast, having 4 billion, and the following video, being around 1 billion. The videos after that must have been national. The video of me earning governor had exactly 257 million views. The next, 200 million, and following, 100 million, and each between losing around 1 million. Until now, my most recent video had 3 views in two hours. Well, I might as well return home after visiting the store.

Blue and red flashing lights approached my beautiful luxury vehicle on my route to the superstore. Damn it, I should have never had this window tint installed. The cop approached my window, which I opened, “good evening officer!” I said happily. “Ma’am, you are wanted on crimes of genocide. You have an outstanding warrant. Please exit the vehicle.” “Could I convince you to let me go?” “No, please exit the vehicle.” I should not have given in to this racist pig. He obviously was a water-drinker; he had no pin on his uniform. And yet I did, and soon after I was sentenced to life in prison.
